MAP Study Space (for Humanities and Social Studies students):

The Deans' Office arranges common work areas for Humanities and Social Studies MAP students. We try to group people with somewhat complementary projects and place students in the same buildings as their mentors to help facilitate a closer working environment. These summer work spaces have been created to encourage student community and to give students a chance to be able to work more effectively. Students who belong to a community of fellow researchers tend to enjoy their experience more than those who do not. An academic social context also helps inexperienced researchers keep on track. In science, a scholarly social context comes with the research itself, because people work together in labs and because there is gathering space for students in the Noyce Science Center. Research in the Humanities and the Social Studies is often a solitary business, so developing a scholarly community has to be a conscious effort.

Students must remember that these are academic spaces and should be respected as such. These spaces are not to be treated as lounges. For example, debris from food, drinks, etc., should be properly discarded. Radios, TVs, etc., are not allowed. These spaces are in close proximity to faculty, staff and other students who need a quiet environment to conduct their own work. Noise should be kept to a minimum in work spaces and hallways. If a key has been issued to you, do not loan it to another student. Never leave interior or exterior doors propped open. You are responsible for the security of all equipment in your work space.

Yes No

- I am requesting a work space to conduct my summer research.
If no, skip the remaining questions.
- Is there anything special about your work that might have an impact on others in the room (e.g. do you need to be conducting phone calls or playing recordings)?
(If so, what?) _____
- Are there special equipment/technology needs? (Individual computers are provided.)
(If so, what?) _____
- I am requesting extended access hours (evening and weekend) for the academic building to which I'm assigned.

I have read and understand the MAP Summer Space Agreement. I understand that noncompliance with these conditions could result in loss of access to study spaces.
