An Analytical Essay

The analytical film essay typically runs 5 to 15 double-spaced pages. Being an analysis, it points out how various parts of the film fit together systematically (see Film Art, p. 351). Like a screening report and a review, the analytical essay includes descriptions, but the descriptions are typically more detailed and extensive. Like the review, the analytical essay also puts forth the writer's opinion, but here the opinion doesn't usually address the ultimate worth of the film. When you analyze a film, you're defending your view of the ways parts of the movie work together.

Think about a sad song. You could describe the song in various ways ("It's about a woman who wants out of a dead-end relationship"). You could also give your evaluation of it ("It's too sentimental"). But you can also analyze it, talking about how the lyrics, the melody, and the instrumentation work together to create the feeling of sadness or to make the listener understand the relationship. That's the sort of things people who study film do when they analyze movies.

The analytical essay is also an argumentative piece. Its goal is to allow you to develop an idea you have about the film by supplying good reasons for considering that idea seriously. The sample analyses in Chapter 11 are argumentative essays. For instance, in analyzing The Thin Blue Line, we argue that the film tells a real-life story in a way that suggests how difficult the search for truth can be (pp. 380–381). Likewise, our discussion of Raging Bull tries to show that the film criticizes violence as used in mass entertainment while still displaying a fascination with its visceral appeal (p. 392).

Preparing to Write

How do you come up with an argument for your essay? The preparatory work usually consists of three steps.

1. Develop a thesis which your essay will explain and support

Start by asking yourself questions. What do you find intriguing or disturbing about the film? What makes the film noteworthy, in your opinion? Does it illustrate some aspect of filmmaking with special clarity? Does it have an unusual effect on the viewer? Do its implicit or symptomatic meanings seem to have particular importance?
Your answer to such questions will furnish the thesis of your analysis. The thesis, in any piece of writing, is the central claim your argument advances. It encapsulates your opinion, but not in the way that a film review states your evaluation of the movie. In an analytical essay, your thesis is one way to help other viewers understand the movie. In our analysis of His Girl Friday (pp. 352–356), our thesis is that the film uses classical narrative devices to create an impression of rapid speed. With respect to Man with a Movie Camera (pp. 376–380), our thesis is that the film makes the viewer aware of how even documentary films manipulate the world they present to us.

Typically, your thesis will be a claim about the film's functions, its effects, or its meanings (or some mixture of all three). For instance, we argue that by creating a wide variety of characters in Do The Right Thing, Spike Lee builds up interconnected plotlines; this allows him to explore the problems of maintaining a community (pp. 361–366). In our discussion of North by Northwest, we concentrate more on how the film achieves the effects of suspense and surprise (pp. 356–361). The analysis of Meet Me in St. Louis emphasizes how technique carries implicit and symptomatic meanings about the importance of family life in America (pp. 387–389).

Your thesis will need some support, some reasons to believe it. Ask yourself, "What would back up my thesis?" and draw up a list of points. Some of these reasons will occur to you immediately, but others will emerge only as you start to study the film more closely. And the reasons, which are conceptual points, will in turn need backup—typically, evidence and examples. You can sum up the structure of an argumentative essay in the acronym TREE: Thesis supported by Reasons which rest upon Evidence and Examples.

2. Draw up a segmentation of the entire film

Analyzing a film is a bit like understanding a building’s design. When we walk through a building, we notice various features—the shape of a doorway, the sudden appearance of an immense atrium. We may not, however, have a very strong sense of the building’s overall architecture. If we are students of architecture, though, we want to study the design of the whole building, and so we’d examine the blueprints to understand how all the individual parts fit together. Similarly, we experience a film scene by scene, but if we want to understand how the various scenes work together, it’s helpful to have a sense of the whole film’s shape.

Movies don’t come equipped with blueprints, so we have to make our own. The best way to grasp the overall shape of the movie is to make a segmentation, as we suggest in Film Art. (See in particular pp. 55, 80, 116–117, 124, 132, and 139.) Breaking the film into sequences gives you a convenient overview, and your segmentation will often suggest things that will support or help you nail down your thesis. For example, in studying The Thin Blue Line, we made a separate list of all the flashbacks to the murder. When we saw them lined up on our page, we spotted the pattern of development in them which became part of our analysis (pp. 381–382).

Now that you have a segmentation, you can go on to see how the parts are connected. In examining a nonnarrative film, you will need to be especially alert to its use of categorical, rhetorical, abstract, or associative principles. See our analysis of Gap-Toothed Women (pp. 116–122) for an example of how you can base an analysis on the overall shape of the film.

If the film presents a narrative, your segmentation can help you answer questions like these: How does each scene set up causes and effects? At what point do we understand the characters' goals, and how do those goals develop in the course of the action? What principles of development connect one scene to another? The opening scenes of Jerry Maguire establish Jerry as a sports agent who's having a crisis of conscience. Fearing he's becoming "another shark in a suit," he impulsively sends out a memo (what he calls a "mission statement") that criticizes his firm's policies. Because of his insubordination, he's fired. Because he needs a job, he tries to build his independent agency on trust, but he sometimes falls back into taking his clients for granted. The bulk of the film consists of his struggle to remain principled—with the help of a woman who tries to bring out his better side and a player who tries to teach him the value of direct communication. Thus the romantic plot line develops in relation to Jerry's efforts to improve both his business and his personality. An analysis of the narrative would show how each scene continues the cause-effect logic, affects the hero's goals, and traces out the changes in his character and his love life.

Should you include your segmentation in your written analysis? Sometimes it will make your argument clearer and more convincing. We think that a broad scene breakdown helps illustrate some key points in our discussions of His Girl Friday (p. 353) and a more detailed one clarifies The Thin Blue Line (pp. 381–382). Perhaps your argument will gain in strength if you bring out a still finer-grained segmentation; we do this in considering the three subsegments of the final chase scene in North by Northwest (pp. 359–361).
However much of your segmentation finally surfaces in your written analysis, it's good to get in the habit of writing out a fairly detailed segmentation every time you examine a film. It will help you get an overall sense of the film's design. You probably noticed that nearly every one of our analyses includes, early on, a statement about the film's underlying formal organization. This provides a firm basis for more detailed analysis. Writing out a segmentation is also good practice if you want to become a filmmaker yourself: screenwriters, directors, and other creative personnel usually work from a plot outline that amounts to a segmentation.

3. Note outstanding instances of film technique

As you watch the film, you should jot down brief, accurate descriptions of various film techniques that are used. You can get ideas for analyzing style from Chapter 10. Once you have determined the overall organizational structure of the film, you can identify salient techniques, trace out patterns of techniques across the whole film, and propose functions for those techniques. These techniques will often support or refine your thesis.

Most basically, you should be alert for techniques taken one by one. Is this a case of three-point lighting? Is this a continuity cut? Just as important, the analyst should be sensitive to context: What is the function of the technique here? Again a segmentation will help you by drawing attention to patterning. Does the technique repeat or develop across the film?

At any moment in a film, so much is going on that it's easy to be overwhelmed by all the technical elements. Shot composition, performance, lighting, camera movement, color design, dialogue, music—all these things can be present and changing from second to second. Often, beginning film analysts are uncertain as to what techniques are most relevant to their thesis. Sometimes they try to describe every single costume or cut or pan, and they wind up drowned in data.

This is where planning your paper's thesis in advance helps you. Your thesis will make certain techniques more pertinent than others. For example, we argue that in North by Northwest Hitchcock creates suspense and surprise by manipulating our range of knowledge (pp. 356–361). Sometimes he lets us know more than the main character, Roger Thornhill, and this builds up suspense: Will Thornhill walk into the traps that we know are awaiting him? At other moments we know only as much as Thornhill does, so that we're as surprised as he is at a new turn of events. Hitchcock devotes particular film techniques to creating these effects. Crosscutting between lines of action gives us more knowledge than Thornhill has, while POV camerawork and cutting restrict us to his understanding of certain situations.

So other techniques, such as lighting or performance style, aren't as relevant to our thesis about North by Northwest. (They might, however, be very relevant to some other thesis about it—say, that it treats thriller conventions somewhat comically.) By contrast, we emphasize acting technique somewhat more in our discussion of Raging Bull, because acting is pertinent to our discussion of the film's use of realistic conventions. Similarly, the editing in Meet Me in St. Louis would be interesting from the standpoint of another argument, but it is not central to the one that we are making, so it goes almost completely unmentioned.

Once you have a thesis, an awareness of the overall shape of the film, and a set of notes on the techniques relevant to your thesis, you are ready to organize your analytical paper.

Organization and Writing

Broadly speaking, an argumentative piece has this underlying structure:

- Introduction: Background information or a vivid example, leading up to:
  - Statement of thesis
- Body: Reasons to believe the thesis
  - Evidence and examples that support the thesis
- Conclusion: Restatement of thesis and discussion of its broader implications

All of our analyses in Chapter 11 adhere to this basic structure. The opening portion seeks to lead the reader into the argument to come, and the thesis is introduced at the end of this introduction. Where the introduction is brief, as in the His Girl Friday analysis, the thesis comes at the end of the first paragraph (pp. 352–353). Where more background material is needed, the introduction is somewhat longer and the thesis is stated a little later. In the Thin Blue Line essay, the thesis comes at the end of the third paragraph (pp. 380–381).

As you know, the building block of any piece of writing is the paragraph. Each slot in the argumentative pattern outlined above will be filled by one or more paragraphs. The introduction is at least one paragraph, the body will be several paragraphs, and the conclusion will be one or two paragraphs.
Typically, the introductory paragraphs of a film analysis don't display much concrete evidence. Instead, this is the place to introduce the thesis you want to advance. Often this involves situating the thesis in relation to some background information. For example, our analysis of Tokyo Story situates the film in a tradition of noncontinuity editing before stating our thesis (p. 371). Usually the introductory paragraph or two set out generalizations of this sort.

If you're adventurous, however, you may wish to avoid background information. You can start with one concrete piece of evidence—say, an intriguing scene or detail from the film—before you move quickly to state your thesis. Our Meet Me in St. Louis piece uses this sort of opening (p. 386).

Writing a film analysis poses a particular problem of organization. Should the body of the argument follow the film's progress in chronological order, so that each paragraph deals with a scene or major part? In some cases this can work. We try it with our Gap-Toothed Women discussion, which traces out the patterns of development across the film (pp. 116–122). By and large, however, you strengthen your argument by following a more conceptual structure of the sort indicated in our outline.

The body of your essay consists of a series of reasons to believe the thesis. You'll back those points up with evidence and examples. Consider our analysis of Breathless (pp. 366–371). Our thesis is that Godard's film both pays homage to film noir outlaw movies and reworks their conventions through a rough-edged treatment. This thesis obliges us to use a comparison-and-contrast strategy. But first we start with a paragraph of background (p. 366), sketching the relevant Hollywood outlaw-movie traditions. The second paragraph (pp. 366–367) shows how the basic story of Breathless resembles the criminal-couple-on-the-run movie. The next three paragraphs (p. 367) make the point that Godard's film also reworks Hollywood conventions: Michel seems to be imitating tough-guy stars, while the film's form and style seem casual, as if aiming to let the audience enjoy a new, more self-conscious version of an American crime movie.

Since the essay relies on comparison and contrast, the body of the piece explores the film's similarities to and differences from Hollywood conventions. The next eleven paragraphs seek to establish these points about the film's narrative form:

1. Michel is like a Hollywood protagonist in certain ways (p. 367).
2. The action is, however, much more choppy and digressive than in a Hollywood film (p. 367).

3. The death of the policeman is handled more abruptly and disconcertingly than in a normal action movie (p. 367).

4., 5. By contrast, the bedroom conversation of Patricia and Michel is untypical of Hollywood genre scenes because it is very static, marking little progress toward Michel’s goals (pp. 367–368).

6. Once the plot starts moving again, it stalls again (p. 368).

7., 8. Moving toward resolution, the plot again picks up, but the finale remains enigmatic and open-ended (p. 368).

9., 10. Overall, Michel and Patricia are puzzling and hard to read as characters (p. 368–369).

11. The characterization of the couple is thus sharply different from that of the romantic couple in most outlaws-on-the-run plots (p. 369).

Each of these points constitutes a reason to accept the thesis that Breathless uses genre conventions but also revises them in unsettling ways.

Supporting reasons may be of many sorts. Several of our analyses distinguish between reasons based upon the film’s overall narrative form and reasons based upon stylistic choices. The portion of the Breathless essay we’ve just reviewed offers evidence to support our claims about the film’s reworking of Hollywood narrative conventions. The paragraphs that follow this material (pp. 369–371) discuss Godard’s similarly self-conscious use of stylistic strategies. In analyzing Meet Me in St. Louis, we concentrate more on reviewing various motifs that create particular thematic effects. In either case, the argument rests on a thesis, supported by reasons, which are in turn supported by evidence and examples.

If you organize the essay conceptually rather than as a blow-by-blow résumé of the action, you may find it useful to acquaint your reader with the plot action at some point. A brief synopsis soon after the introduction may do the trick. (See, for example, our North by Northwest analysis, pp. 356–361.) Alternatively, you may wish to cover basic plot material when you discuss segmentation, characterization, causal progression, or other topics. The crucial point is that the writer isn’t forced to follow the film’s order.

Typically, each reason for the thesis becomes the topic sentence of a paragraph, with more detailed evidence displayed in the sentences that follow. In the Breathless example, each main point is followed by specific examples of how plot action, dialogue, or film techniques at once refer to Hollywood tradition and loosen up the conventions. Here is where your detailed notes about salient scenes or techniques will be very useful. You can select the strongest and most vivid instances of mise-en-scene, cinematography, editing, and sound to back up the main point that each paragraph explores.

The body of the analysis can be made more persuasive by several other tactics. A paragraph that compares or contrasts this film with another might help you zero in on specific aspects that are central to your argument. You can also include a brief in-depth analysis of a single scene or sequence that drives your argumentative point home. We use this tactic in discussing several films’ endings, chiefly because a concluding section often reveals broad principles of development. For instance, the last two scenes of Jerry Maguire underscore the two plotlines, professional and personal. First comes his professional reward: Jerry’s client Rod triumphs on the field and pays tribute to Jerry’s personal investment in his career. The last scene shows Jerry, Dorothy, and her son strolling past a playground, underscoring their reconciliation as a family (and developing the hints dropped in the beginning that one of Jerry’s redeeming qualities is his concern for children). Just as we advise you to pay particular attention to the film’s ending as a key place to discover what the film’s trying to do (p. 55), a close analysis of the film’s ending can be a convincing way to end the body of your analysis.

In general, the body of the argument should progress toward stronger or subtler reasons for believing the thesis. In discussing The Thin Blue Line, we start by tracing how the film provides a kind of reconstructed investigation, leading to the killer (pp. 380–383). Only then do we ask: Is the film more than a neutral report of the case (383–384)? This leads us to argue that the filmmaker has subtly aligned our sympathies with Randall Adams (p. 384). Yet the film goes beyond aligning us with Adams. It also bombards us with a great deal of information, some of it fairly minute, even trivial. The purpose, we suggest, is to make the viewers share some of the obligation to sort out conflicting data and notice apparently minor details (pp. 384–385). This is a fairly complex point that would probably not come across if introduced early on. Only after the analysis has worked through more clear-cut matters is it possible to consider such nuances of interpretation.

How to end your argumentative essay? Now is the time to restate the thesis (skillfully, not repeating previous statements word for word) and to remind the reader of the reasons to entertain the thesis. The ending is also an opportunity for you to try for a bit of eloquence, a telling quotation, a bit of historical context, or a concrete motif from the film itself—perhaps a line of dialogue or an image that encapsulates your thesis. In making preparatory notes, ask yourself constantly: Is there something here that can create a vivid ending?

Just as there is no general recipe for understanding film, there is no formula for writing incisive and enlightening film analyses. But there are principles and rules of thumb that govern good writing of all sorts. Only through writing, and constant rewriting, do these principles and rules come to seem second nature. By analyzing films, we can understand the sources of our pleasure in them and we are able to share that understanding with others. If we succeed, the writing itself can give pleasure to ourselves and our readers.

Key Questions for an Analytical Essay

1. Do you have a thesis? Is it stated clearly by the end of the first or second paragraph of your analysis?
2. Do you have a series of reasons supporting the thesis? Are these arranged in logical and convincing order (with the strongest reason coming last)?
3. Are your supporting reasons backed up? Do your segmentation and your stylistic analysis provide specific evidence and examples for each reason you offer?
4. Does your beginning orient your reader to the direction of your argument? Does your concluding paragraph reiterate your thesis and provide a vivid ending?